A 'proof of work' is some piece of data that an agent within the network has to present attached to the proposed block. A proof of work should always be easy to verify, but it must be hard to produce: it demonstrates that the proposer invested effort before making the proposition, typically in terms of computational power (and associated energetic consumption). The proof has a difficulty level which controls how hard it is to produce a valid instance. The difficulty of the proof is varied to keep issuance rate approximately constant.
